Typically, bullies and their victims share the same characteristic: low self-esteem. Whether they internalize or externalize their feelings determines if they become bullies or victims of bullying.

Usually, negative situations and events in a child's life can trigger low self-esteem. Externalizing feelings of pain or discomfort or worthlessness, which start in the home, can cause some children to become bullies as they seek to control their social environment to compensate for their lack of control in their family. For instance, if parents of a child are separating or divorcing, the child might feel responsible for the situation, or powerless to keep the parents together. Frustration and anger develop. As a result the child might take out the anger on others, to compensate for the lack of control over the parents' separation.

Other children internalize their feelings by refusing to talk about how they feel. Instead they become depressed and withdrawn, and see themselves as failures or lacking in some important way. When a bully attacks such a child, the attack validates this child's feelings of inadequacy, so the child often reacts negatively, accepting or confirming the negative self-validation because he/she feels the bully is correct.

Children with high self-esteem do not respond negatively to bullies because they already know that negative personal statements made by the bully are untrue and therefore unworthy of attention. The main goal of bullies is to get their victims to experience fear, anger or sadness. Once their victims demonstrate these emotions by words, actions or body language, the bully has control, and the bullying will continue until the victim no longer responds in the desired way.

Words and physical responses can hurt, and ignoring the bully does not work. One strategy to diffuse bullying is to help the victim to understand the power of words. Parents should discover what words the bully uses. Discussing and understanding these words can rob them of their strength, and the victim needs a supply of less attacking words to help diffuse the situation before physical violence starts. In addition, the child being bullied needs to remember that if he/she retaliates using the same words used by the bully, the situation will get worse as the bully will respond in kind.

It is very easy to feel sympathetic towards victims of child bullying. However, it would be more helpful to the victim if we try to empower them to counter the bullying. Success at this will help restore their own self-esteem and strength.
