Questions 4 and 5 are based on the following survey. Answer BOTH questions.

Venice, an island with a population of just above three million persons, is considered by many to be the world's powerhouse of sprinting. This small nation's all-time medal count for Olympic Games from 1896 to 2014 is an astounding 67 medals. Among these are a total of 12 gold medals in sprinting events from the last Olympic Games. In the last five years, both men and women from this country have also dominated the sprint events at every major world athletic championship.

Many reasons have been given to explain this nation's sprinting dominance. Some say it is the diet of the athletes, others say it is their genes; there are those who point to a school system that helps to nurture sprinting talent.

To set the record straight, a research company conducted a survey among residents ages 15–70 to get their opinion on what makes these athletes run so fast. Three thousand persons were polled. This represents one per cent of the population.

The result revealed that 25 per cent of those polled said that good coaching was responsible, 20 per cent said it was the diet, 10 per cent said it was the genes, 40 per cent said it was the schools' athletic programmes, while 5 per cent indicated that they were not sure.

The results were published as an article in the main daily newspaper in the country.
